POWER:

recognition of the histories of minoritized speakers and their struggles;
critical awareness of the social construction of language norms and standardization;
critical reflection about power relations associated with languages, language learners and language users

COGNITIVE:

Metalinguistic
and metacognitive aspects
of language learning: how languages work and how we learn them

PERFORMANCE:

Language
and literacy skills,
flexibility,
translanguaging

AFFECTIVE:

Socio-emotional feelings
associated with languages,
Language learning and
language users

SOCIAL:

linguistic and cultural

Plurilinguaging for all?

Even if a person identifies as a (monolingual) dominant language speaker, they can develop the practice of be(com)ing a ‘multilingual listener’ -- or a plurilingual actor who is prepared to lean into multilingual encounters with empathy, as well as linguistic and cultural curiosity and sensitivity.

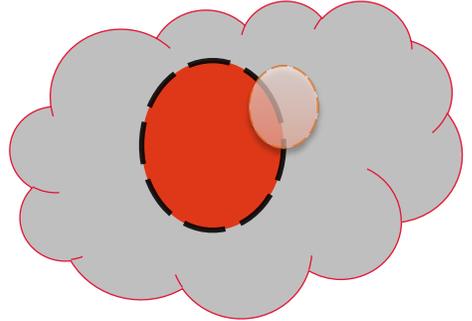

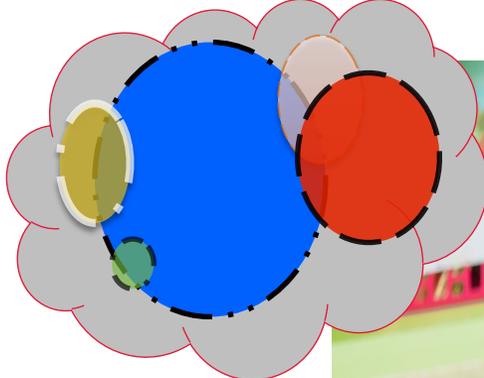

“In diverse school contexts where teachers are increasingly called upon to support multilingual learners from multiple different cultural and linguistic backgrounds in mainstream classrooms, we used the concept of becoming “multilingual listeners” as a way of making multilingualism accessible. The multilingual listener takes an active stance as an English dominant speaker who recognizes their linguistic privilege and takes responsibility for mediating communication with multilingual speakers based on an understanding of bi/multilingualism as natural, flexible, fluid and creative, and their critical awareness of the relations of power that perpetuate systemic barriers for minoritized multilingual speakers in school and society.”

Identity Texts (Cummins 2006, Cummins & Early, 2011)

“Students invest their identities in the creation of texts - written, spoken, signed, visual, musical, dramatic or multimodal combinations. The identity text then offers students a mirror in which their identities are reflected in a positive way. When bilingual students from marginalized social backgrounds write in both their native language (L1) and the language of the school (L2), the identity text validates their bilingualism as a personal and academic asset and challenges widespread social prejudices that devalue their linguistic talents.

Similarly, when students share identity texts with multiple audiences (peers, teachers, parents, grandparents, Internet-connected partner classes, media, etc.), they are likely to receive positive feedback and affirmation in interaction with these audiences. Although not always an essential component, technology plays an amplifying role in enhancing the process of producing and disseminating identity texts.”

Why Theory & Practice Matter for Teachers

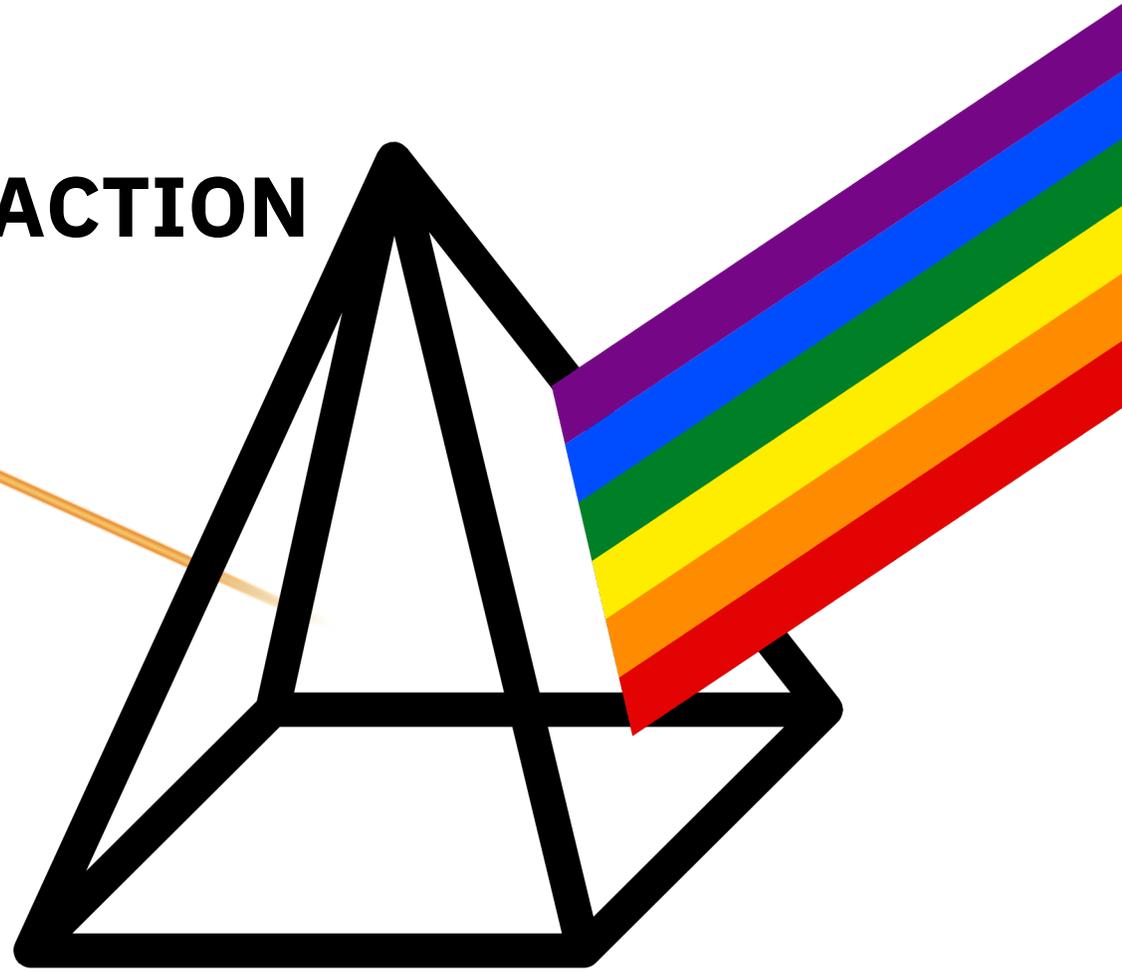

“Theory(ies) provide explanatory frameworks for understanding practice, and practice leads to the development of theories, for the theory(ies) must be able to account for what has happened in the past, describe what is happening in the present, and predict what will happen in the future. When the theory(s) cannot meet any of these conditions, the theoretical frameworks must be interrogated, revised, and/or reconceptualized.”

Prasad et Lory (2020) p. 810

One day when Julie and Emilie were going out to recess, they found a message. They thought it was a simple piece of paper, but when they read it they couldn't understand it. It was in code but they were determined to translate it.

Un jour alors que Julie et Emilie allaient à la récré elles trouvèrent un message. Elles pensaient que c'était un simple morceau de papier, mais en le lisant elles ne pouvaient pas le comprendre car il était codé. Pourtant elles étaient déterminées à le traduire.

Cultivating Linguistic and Cultural Collaboration in the Classroom

Linguistic and Cultural Collaboration

Linguistic and Cultural Collaboration takes place when educators, students, and the various actors in the community engage critically and creatively in the collective transformation of a deficit view of linguistic and cultural plurality and the deconfiguration of coercive power relations and exclusionary policies. In the classroom, LCC is shaped by purposeful instructional choices that foster space for deconstructing social representations of minoritized languages and cultural groups in order to co-construct all students and educators as agentive plurilingual social actors (Coste & Simon, 2009; Lahire, 2005).

Collaboration in the classroom: Writing thank-you notes to families through plurilinguaging

... meanwhile I watched an interaction between two girls with blonde hair (SL & SN) who are both English dominant speakers. SL finished her thank-you card and gave it to the teacher. Then, as instructed, she offered to help her friend (SN) with writing her card. SL suggested that SN should write thank-you in Spanish because she was making a card for a Spanish-speaking student's family who had helped with translation into Spanish:

SN: I don't know what to write.

SL: You could write 'thank-you' in Spanish. 'Gracias!'

SN: I don't know how to write in Spanish.

SL: I'll go to the board. I can tell you the letters.

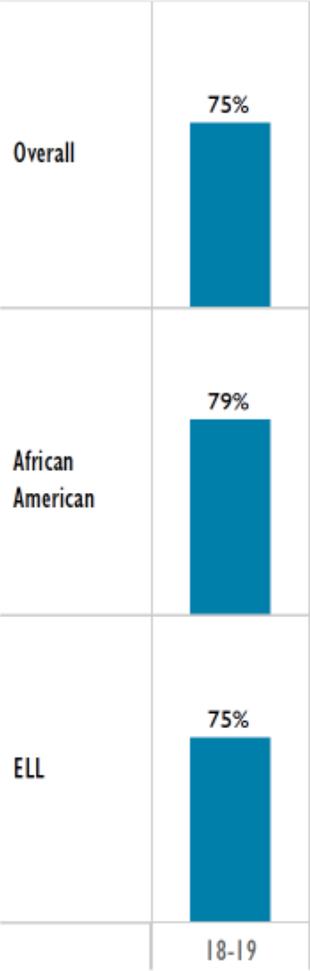

SN: Ok!

SL: G-R-A...

Sl goes to the white board, reads letter names in English as she points to each letter and SN transcribes the Spanish message "Gracias" and then continues her note in English.

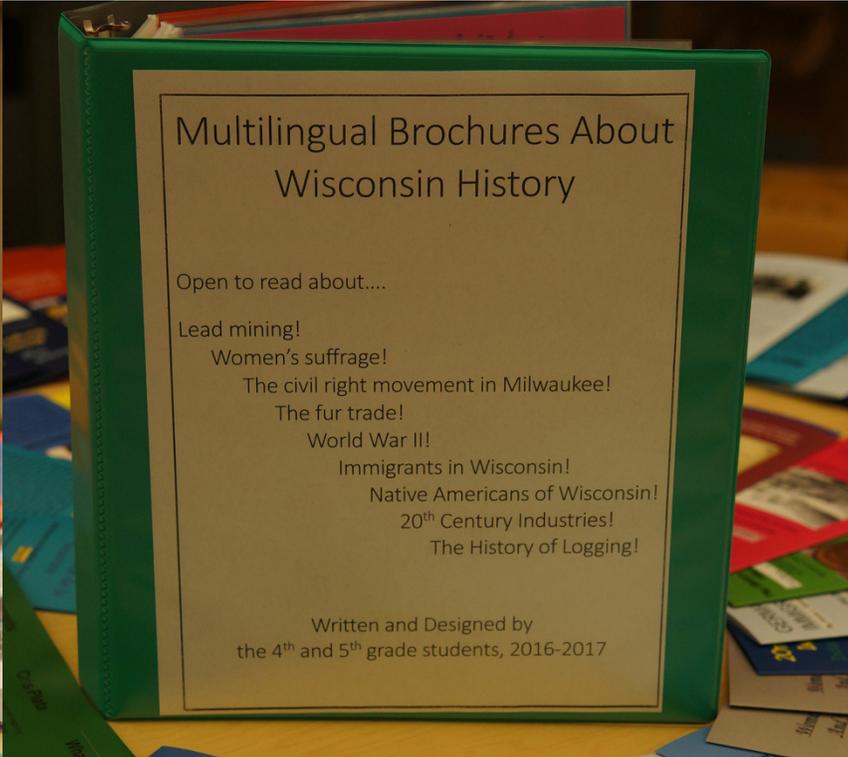

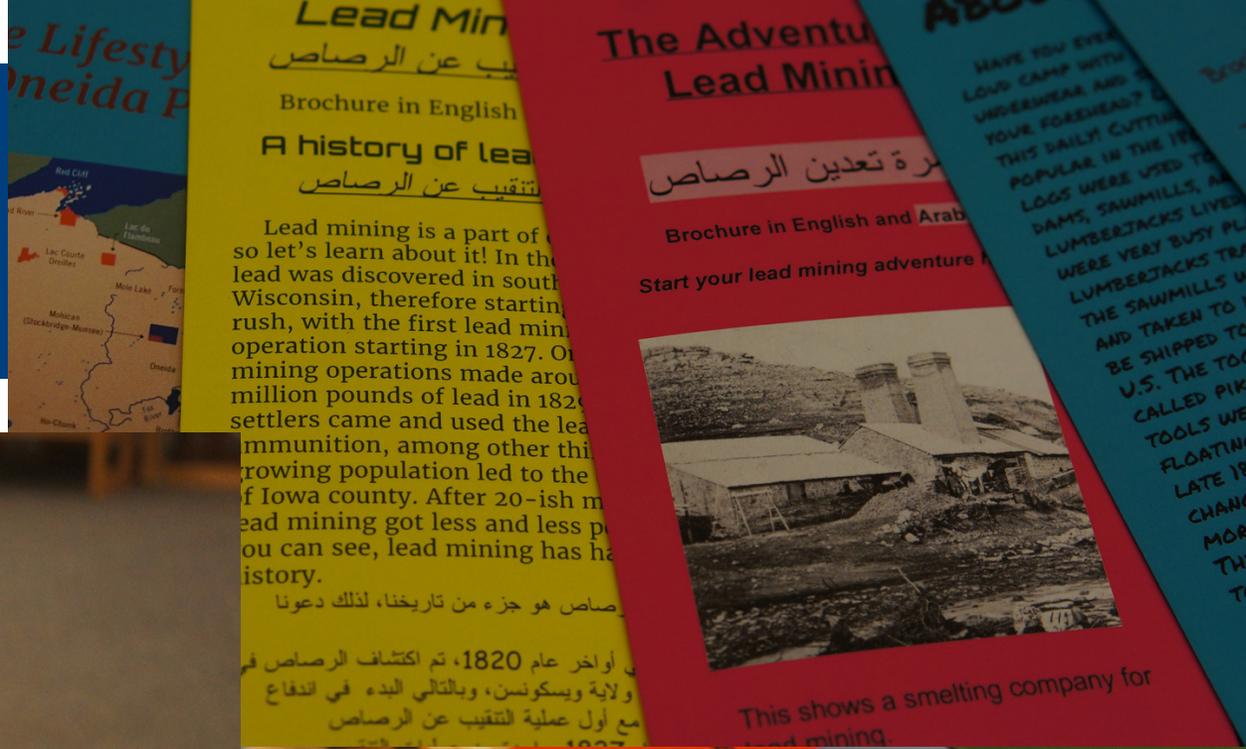

Climate Survey: I feel I belong at this school.

Collaborative Multilingual Project Reflections

“...I read the Spanish part for the trilingual English, Romanian, Spanish book and the look on the face of the one child in the entire school who speaks Romanian while her mom read aloud to her class just melted my heart. I feel that this experience helps our students’ value what it is that makes them special.”

“We have a more peaceful society if we are more exposed to each other because when you don't know each other, you tend to fear the other or make negative assumptions. So when we are all learning about each other, things become more natural, and I think in the future become more peaceful.”

“...What was really great about this [collaborative multilingual book-making ] is because even though they may speak a different language at home or they’ve been exposed to different things, you know, they still had to come together, work as a group, create this wonderful book that they created and in the end it’s not..it’s just a different language, a different way. So I don’t know; it’s neat. I think a lot of the students were really surprised about how many languages there really were; there was like fifteen languages or something in my class. I mean I was shocked. I knew there was a lot of languages but I wasn’t really aware...”

Collaborative Multilingual Project Reflections

“...there are stories inside all of us...”

“...I’m glad I got to work with Soumaiya because she added Arabic to our group and our book is so amazing.”

“...making a book in a different language is special to me because I can read all the languages [in our book] and that makes me proud.”

“...when I was writing our book, I learned that two minds full of imagination can do something big and creative. I also learned about other languages.”

“I never liked reading and writing before [our collaborative multilingual project] but now I think I like it.”

Towards Critical Multilingual Language Awareness and Plurilingual Allyship

What is PLURILINGUAL ALLYSHIP?

an active, sustained and arduous practice of unlearning and re-evaluating, in which a person in a position of privilege and power seeks to operate in solidarity with a minoritized group

Five types of actions to demonstrate plurilingual allyship:

- disrupt monolingualism as the norm;
- recognize linguistic privilege;
- engage in plurilingual risk-taking;
- enter into linguistic and cultural collaboration (with people and communities beyond our communicative comfort); and
- become a language activist.

(Prasad, 2023)

By adopting a linguistically expansive orientation to teaching and learning, teachers make explicit how all students' can draw on and expand their dynamic communicative repertoires as resources for deepening learning and building social ties.

As students from different linguistic, cultural and social backgrounds work collaboratively on creative and critical multilingual content-based projects, they engage in linguistic risk-taking that develops their mediational competence both as speakers and listeners in dynamic multilingual interactions.

By design then, students become invested in supporting one another to accomplish multilingual and multimodal work that they could not do alone. As they develop critical multilingual awareness in community, they can be(come) plurilingual allies and activists beyond the classroom.
